* Adobe Photoshop Elements. Photoshop's most basic counterpart is available for free with the purchase of a consumer version of Photoshop software. Elements supports RAW photo files and provides basic image editing with adjustment layers and saved states (as in any of the earlier incarnations of Photoshop). If you're not a Photoshop user, Elements is a good stepping stone to the full Photoshop experience, although you can do all the basic editing on the free version. Elements includes a basic collection of filters for refining any photo, organizing your photos in slide shows, creating greeting cards from your photos, cropping images (even for use as backgrounds), and so on. If you want a basic program, this is a great choice for you.

Ask HN: Am I being a jerk by asking for permission to use someone's work? - jacknews I'm in the early stages of developing an app. I am currently looking for someone I can ask for help on how to implement a specific feature on the app.I've come across the following situation a few times. Someone would have an idea how to make an app do something. I know they've already built a prototype of this. I would like to give the person an idea how I can add that feature to the prototype, instead of just copy and pasting the prototype.The problem is I don't want to be a jerk and come across that I'm just looking for a little free time to copy/paste someone else's work and not give the person any credit at all.This is something I've gotten a "gentle nudge" on several times and I've probably received a dozen no thanks responses. I can understand if someone is being paid by the hour to do this work. But I'm currently just helping myself out of some free time.How do I ask for permission to use someone's work without being a jerk? Am I just being a jerk? Is it not cool to ask someone for help? ===== karmakaze If it's written down you're clear you're not stealing or doing something illegal then just be upfront about it with the person and say, "Hey, I'm having trouble implementing a feature on your app. Could you take a few minutes to explain how to add this feature?" How you ask depends on how they respond. Chances are they'll be flattered and know you want to contribute to their project. If they react in a "no, I've never thought of doing this" or "I'm already doing it" then you're lost--if they can't show you or point you to the necessary parts then there's no way to improve your solution. ~~~ jacknews Thanks for the quick reply. I was indeed unsure if I was just being a jerk by asking for help. I guess on this
