Let say that I have : const a = 123; const b = 321; function getA(foo) { // do something with a, foo is not a parameter } function getB() { // return a or b } I can know if getA is called by getB by checking if foo is not undefined. But is there any way to know if getB is called by getA? A: There's no direct way, you can however use the fact that calling functions that do not exist, or that do exist but have the same name as some existing function, is assigned to the existing function. Let's say you have 2 functions named getFoo(), but only one of them is actually defined (the other one is using the same name as the real function, but it's not existent). If you call getFoo() you will be automatically assigned to the existent function getFoo() by the interpreter. For example: // These won't work, variables don't match the functions var foo = getFoo(); console.log(foo); // foo = getFoo() // Not undefined so nothing will be printed // This will work getFoo(); console.log(foo); 2004–05 Georgian Cup The 2004–05 Georgian Cup (also known as the David Kipiani Cup) was the 59th season overall and 18th since independence of the Georgian annual football tournament.
