Two previous posts have discussed this problem. In both of those posts a proposed solution was to place a long green rope between the two power sources. One end of the rope is connected to a high voltage source and the other to a low voltage source. You'd then need to monitor the actual voltage being produced by the power supply to ensure the lower voltage isn't going high enough to cause damage to the device. The old approach to solving this problem was to just make sure the power supply wasn't drawing more power than needed, which in the case of the ribbon cable a couple thousand volts wouldn't do much. (I used to be a mechanical engineer, and that's one of the reasons that is how I got out of the working world.) The problem with the solution above and the other proposed solution of adding a fuse between the power supplies is that it's creating a whole new variable. For example, if the same fuse was used in different circuits then the fuse would blow and the circuit would be disabled but not the entire power supply. This would require circuits to be disabled based on the voltage of the circuit while they are active, which is a lot of wires. It would also take into account what voltage is actually being drawn by the circuit while it's active. We'd also be trying to balance between the voltage and the current through the fuse to determine what would be the ideal current through the fuse. The solution I'm proposing is to just use a fuse OR use a circuit breaker OR use a circuit that detects a high current and shuts down the supply. In the case of the circuit breaker there is the added bonus of automatically restoring power to the circuit. There is an opportunity to improve this design by just not connecting to the power supply. An example of this can be seen in most TV's. Power supplies for TVs are e79caf774b
